

“Dost thou love life, then do not squander time, for that is the stuff that life is made of”

It is important to value every little moment of life. Most of us take minutes, hours and moments and never truly understand the importance of time. We are disconnected from understanding our mortality to an extent that we do not realize that we came in one day and soon we will go away, and in between we have the few moments in the journey of life. Time is not money, time is life. Money can be gained again, but once time is gone it cannot be reversed. Our time is limited, so we should not waste it by living someone else's life. We should create and live our own lives, and avoid being trapped by limiting dogma.

“We are obsessed with money, yet we do not take money seriously.”

Money is important for the simple reason that it gives you the freedom to do what is important to you. Money helps in creating memories, improving the world around you and experiencing life. Money should be used wisely. It should not cost our relationships, health, dignity, intelligence, souls or joy in the simple things in life. However, we must learn to strike a balance. The effort and time spent on earning, saving and protecting money takes away the effort and time we spend on the things we value in life. We need money, but it should always be remembered that when money comes to us it comes with a big price tag.
