Tiavonn Redfield
ENGN 132-01 Info, Literacy & Research
Ms. Batten
9/13/2020

Racial Unrest in America

As, the year 2020 to continue do I think that racial prejudice still exists in our society? A great man had said "Lets us all hope that the dark clouds of racial prejudice will soon pass away." This quote came from Martin Luther King and it was written in 1963.

In my opinion I do feel like racial prejudice still exist but it's in the shadow. So, what I mean is like racial prejudice do exists but it hides behind our Government, Education, and Social Media like a shadow would. Just as shadow it don't come to the surface until some light is shine on it. Along with a shadow when the light stop shine on it get cover right back in the darkness like nothing happen. That just how racial prejudice work in our society now.

First, I choose the government for my example because a lot racial prejudice happens behind there. Like the government does allow some racial people into their system start off with the law enforcement. When act happen between a white officer in a suit and a black victim that is dead. We see it as racial prejudice when that officer doesn't have the right calls to act in the way they did to the victim. Then when problem to start happen around the country about the event that. Then Government want to step in and cover it as the officer not being racial but took his power to far and he will punish for his action. In addition, some of these officers might be races but we will never no because the government always cover it.

Secondly, you have the education that deal with racial prejudice since way back. The reason why I said that because back in the old days they were extremely racial about what race should get the education. But now it's just like everyone can get education but it depends on what school you get the education from. Because some education system will give there all to them top school so they can be ready for college and them school is mostly white. If it mostly all black school the education system is going to give them oh okay education but have them lacking in some area that they should know if they want to head to college. Beside that the education system just covers it as along if the kid gets an education everything should be alright.

Thirdly, and the mostly racial prejudice is the social media. The reason why because it so many Memes, AD's, and etc..... That come up on the social media to the point that you can't even take it seriously. But the racism is sitting right there in your face. Like for your example you see white people try to people funny by doing black people stuff. Then you see black people trying to be funny and do white people all on social media. That's racial prejudice because it discriminating someone race and how they act. But the social media cover it all up because it makes be funny so people can't see the racial prejudice going on.

For my conclusion, racial prejudice still does exist in our society. But it all cover behind things that we are close like the Government, Education system, and the Social media. People have to realize that racial prejudice is still among us. Cover up so good to the point that we can see it for just that moment then it starts to fade away from us like shadow when the sunlight or any type of light go way from an object.