“The Analects”

1. The general characteristics of Manhood according to Confucius is all about being a true Gentleman. He believed that the gentleman should be held up to 5 characteristics, they are humility, sincerity, graciousness, magnanimity, and diligence. Being able to hold up these 5 characteristics makes you true to manhood.
2. Some characteristics about having a good government is making sure everything good having good leadership good people in the chairs good people ruling and people in line that wants to make things to up to standards.
3. The relationship between the individual and the society is knowing your place. But through it all everyone has a right to say or do how they feel but just knowing your place. The individual is a part of a society but through it you must know your place.
4. The role of shame is more of a self-perfection. The role of shame is to be aware of the other feelings around you. Shame is more of a family thing instead of individuals. Because the moral of shame is to be there for others have good intentions for the ones around you.
5. It's important to hear and see actions from one other than the other because seeing actions from a lot of people can give off different emotions. It'll make you question things because you're hearing it from a lot of people because hearing it from a lot of people its “he say she say” that’s how rumors start. Hearing it from one person is better than a lot. People are put in place for a reason for example back in these days if something was supposed to be said or given out it'll come from the ruler or king or even the queen because things come the people that hold weight behind their name.
