

Five years from now I see myself as a self-employed millionaire. Since COVID-19 hit, it has showed me how detrimental it is to have your own source of income because we can't always depend on jobs or the government to financially support us. The first step to achieving my five-year goal would be to acquire my brokering certification. I am currently taking an online course to become a certified freight broker/dispatcher which is conducive to my plans of starting my own trucking company. I plan to be done with the course by December 2020 therefore, after I graduate in May I can jump right into it. Having a brokering certification puts me in the same salary range I would be in if I were using my college degree. The goal is to begin brokering immediately after graduation and I give myself until 2023 to have purchased two 18-wheeler trucks of my own and that will be the start up of my trucking company. In the mean time I will also be taking courses and attending seminars on real estate because I'm interested in investing in that as well both selling and buying properties. My main thing I want to do with real estate is flip houses.

Although I'm acquiring a degree in Public Health in May I do not plan on using or relying on it as my career job. If all else fails or if my business starts off slow I'll always have that degree to fall back on. As I've mentioned before, COVID-19 has a huge impact on my change of heart pertaining my five year goals.

Personal goals I plan to reach in a five year span is start my own skin care line and travel all over the world. I also would like to purchase my first car and become a homeowner within the next five years.
