

Childhood educators has evolved over years and some of there practices are still being used today. My primary years in school are memories that I will never forget. I was a very hyper little boy and catching my attention was not very easy. However, I had several teachers that could capture my attention without making me hate school but there were some teachers that made a major impact on me. This impact helped me make the decision to become an educator. Like Maria Montessori, my second-grade teacher really worked with me. She grabbed my interest in many ways for instance like wanting to read for pleasure. She encouraged me and not forced me. Ms. Mills was a very patient teacher, who formed a relationship with each one of her students. She did not make me feel bad about having ADHD. He was constantly challenging me. The assignments the we had allowed us to read books that we enjoyed, and her class consisted of lots on group interactions. Like Montessori, I believed that she allowed us to be in control of our own learning through creativity. The structure of the class was not stiff and full of lectures.
