

Greeting Professor Mae Reggy

The people in the restaurant, seems to me to be from the Caribbean, in my observation, there were a family of four, a man and a woman with two children in a booth. There a couple sitting at a table which seats four. There was a woman, middle age, that was to me definitely look like she was from the Caribbean's island, the way she was dress, sitting by herself, (trying not to profile).

The peoples that interact with had a slight accent, which was the couple, that I interact with, "asking me the pig feet question" Then, there was the music, which was reeking Caribbean's songs.

People was coming in for takeout order, which made me believed, that this was a favorite restaurant in this area, and I was surprised. I was wondering if this neighborhood, had quite an overflow of Jamaican in this area. All in all, to me the people, in that restaurant, did not look to be African American, if I can say it like that. A question, that I can't answer, do the Jamaican people considered themselves African American, they can't be African American if they were born in Jamaica. I answer, my own question, they considered themselves Jamaican. Question, can the people in Jamaica tell that I'm not from Jamaica if I was visiting there, by just looking at me, because, just looking at that middle age woman, she just did not look to be African American, even though she was black, I'm trying to be as honest as I can.
