

The art of writing.

Literature and the need to learn calls for the tools that facilitate or/and make a platform for easy integrated writing. The passion to write gives the learner a positive unwavering spirit to attain amazing skills, enabling them to perfect in the field of education. Necessity is the source of invention, so is literature. This paved way to the creation of the remarkable skills in literature i.e. APA, MLA and Turabian styles of writing, among others. In this document, I'll specifically look at these three in brief.

First and foremost, APA [American Psychological Association] is one of the great tools in writing. It builds up the art of writing to cutting-edge. This type of style is used mostly in education, psychology and sciences platforms. Subject to its richness in citation, students and professors who write and edit social and behavioral sciences find it a vital element.

MLA in its essence beautifies the art of writing largely in humanities, literature and related subjects. MLA basically stands for Modern Language Association. It's more of a vehicle which enables writing work effective even internationally.

In addition to this, Turabian style of writing brings onboard more fascinating dynamics especially when a scholar is on a specific field such as business, history and the fine Arts. Chicago manual style/ Turabian originates from Kate L. Turabian, the author of "A manual for Research papers, Theses, and Dissertations." She advises students on research and writing from topic selection to finished paper including citations.

Apparently both styles contribute a great percentage in the art of writing. They make a master piece in the hand of a scholar, facilitating effectiveness in literature. Knowledge is key, so is reading and writing.
