Scenario

Travis hasn't been himself lately. He stopped hanging out with people, seems distant and irritable, and disrupted a skills lab. Play the role of his classmate, Jesse, and find out what's going on and how you can help.

Asking Open-Ended Questions

0 of 0 points

Rationale:

You asked open-ended questions, which can't be answered with just one or two words. They're a great way to invite people to share their thoughts or brainstorm ideas. Here are some open-ended questions you asked:

"What would you say to a client who was stressed out?"

"What else might help you feel better?"

There were several moments when you gave Travis some unsolicited advice or argued with him. Here are two examples:

"You could use the time watching TV to keep up with things."

"Maybe getting more sleep could help."

In general, it's more helpful to understand the person you're talking to before trying to give advice or argue a point. A lot of times people already have the information and ideas they need to solve a problem, and what they most need is someone to help them think things through.

Making Neutral Observations

0 of 0 points

Rationale:

Good job using neutral observations to bring up topics of concern and encourage Travis to open up. Here are some neutral observations you made:

"I think most nurses have to adjust to the stress."

"Sounds like your de-stressing strategy may be stressful."

You avoided making judgmental statements (like "You got yourself into a bad situation") or negatively labeling Travis's behavior (like "We think you're depressed"). Good work!

Making a Referral

0 of 0 points

Rationale:

When you're talking to someone about seeking help, there are a few helpful approaches you can take. It helps to frame ideas as questions, reduce the stigma around seeking help, and give the person space to make their own decision.

You did a good job of framing your idea as a question when you said:

Travis worried that seeking help might mean he was "crazy." You helped him see it can be normal to seek help. For example, you said:

Nice job giving Travis space to make the decision himself. Your support came across especially clearly when you said:

"It's your decision. I don't want to pressure you."
