COVID-19 is a worldwide disease that has affected many people and businesses. It has caused schools to go online; putting a delay in the education of students. Academic scores have gone down tremendously due to the priority being the safety of both staff and students during this difficult time. Luckily, data reported worldwide shows low rates of infection in children with evidence also stating low levels of transmission are associated with children. Although it is very important to keep parents and school- aged children informed on new updates regarding the pandemic, it is also very important to take safety measures to remain healthy.

The COVID-19 pandemic has affected the school system tremendously. It continues to change the lives of everyone and has also increased the difficulty on the students, staff and school nurse. The school nurses' responsibility is to provide evidence-based guidance and support towards the parents and students in regard to their health. Nurses are always planning ahead to try and engage with the students and their families regarding their health in and out of school. School nurses are continuously on their toes about new evidence being discovered about the disease to maintain child safety, then pass the information on to the students, parents and staff. This pandemic brings to light the many complications students have in accessing nutrition, safe household, transportation and more. School nurses' also call the child's home to check up on known health conditions and making sure their families have the proper resources to keep them healthy. School nurses also make sure families have enough medications, food to meet the student's nutrition as much as they can and other supplies in order to stay healthy and cope with this pandemic.
