

REFLECTION

I enjoyed going to SIM today. I like when we do critical thinking activities because I learn how to think about every part of a situation and how they connect together. I also learn the “why” behind the situation in order to come up with a solution. I was able to complete my CPE, and we talked about med errors, what to do when you make a mistake, and the importance of not cutting certain corners. It is nice to talk about nursing in a “real life” sense instead of in a “perfect world” sense. Playing the board game today made me realize what I had a good understanding of and what I need to study. For example, I need to learn labs. Although we had a lab lecture at the beginning of the module, labs weren’t something, from what I understood, that we needed to stress over. However, from the feedback we got today in SIM, labs is something I need to focus on and study. I have really enjoyed this module and each and every instructor. I like that everyone makes learning fun, and no one expects perfection as long as we’re learning. I do wish there had been enough time to listen to lung sounds after we did our CPE because I feel like that is something I struggle with during assessments. I know I will get better at it the more I do it. I appreciate every instructor and for the opportunity to learn and experience new things.
