

Self-Evaluation

I grew up in a small town where everyone knows everyone. I talk to everyone, and it is all kinds of people kids, middle aged people, or people over 65. The thing that I could probably work on is talking more to the men in the middle-aged group. I also grew up in a household where my mom works with mentally disabled people, and I absolutely love each and everyone of them. We used to have two of them living with us. So, it really taught me to be nice to everyone because you do not know what others have been through or going through. I would treat every patient the same and be courteous to them. I would not interact differently with a patient if they were obese or whatever they had going on. The main thing I would need to work on is talking to the men in the middle-aged group. Some ways I can do that is going and talking more to them.