

Today in SIM was a great learning experience. The escape room was fun and something different to make us think completely out of the box. I initially expected today to not be so challenging. I thought our team would go in there and know exactly where to start and that's the opposite of what happened. My team and I got too ahead of ourselves and I can't speak for others, but I felt so lost on where to begin. We were solving clues but not communicating on how we thought they were relevant to the game. I think we all tried to figure out one task at a time instead of delegating tasks to work more efficiently and multitask. When I thought about our assignment today, I thought good teamwork and communication would be enough to help us get through the task, turn out there's so much more than we needed to incorporate to be successful. I think if we would have had a designated leader things would have gone more smoothly. Toward the end, we ended up communicating more effectively and almost completed the assignment in time but overall, I think we didn't go in with a plan and a leader and that was our downfall. Today taught me that working as a team and having effective communication is important, but when working with a team having a leader and each team member contributing in different ways makes the goal easier to reach.
