Findings of Fact

Only a little occurred in this case. But the nurse Jennifer Bloys accessed a pt's medical record seven times for no reason. With her action, she has violated HIPPA.

Prevention

In this case, there are only a couple of preventions that come to mind to prevent a HIPPA violation. Number one don't look at pt's charts without authorization if they are not yours. Number two maybe the facility that she works for can do a quarterly or twice-a-year mandatory education over HIPPA violations. Lastly, maybe the company should make an electronic barrier for hospital staff so that they can only access their patients

Universal Competencies

Safety and Security (Emotional)

The nurse broke HIPPA. The pt's chart is then exposed and the pt may not want specific things to be known.

Critical Thinking

The nurse should have known to not look at a patient's chart that wasn't on their assignments.

Professional Role

The nurse needs to be professional in the workplace and not go "browsing" on patients' charts and violating HIPPA rules.

If I Was The Nurse Who Saw

If I was the nurse that spotted the nurse breaking HIPPA I would have confronted her and told her that's not okay. I would have told her that she has an opportunity to go to the charge and come clean about what she did before I am obligated to report her to the charge nurse.
