

I want to be nurse for multiple reasons including my love for science, my love for patient care as well as valuing the ultimate well-being of humans. As a child, my love for nursing was always prevalent however I did not do as well in science classes compared to English. I thought I would never become a math or science driven person until 12th grade biology. After senior year I knew there was a way to enjoy science rather than be intimidated by it. While transitioning from high school to adulthood and attending college, I tapped into my love for science through required experiments, historic theories and the ultimate anatomy of a human body. As I attended university, I worked part time as a Certified Nursing Aid in a local hospital. There is where I discovered my love for patient care. I dealt with many different people, obtained a wide range of patient care experience in which I felt the undeniable need to provide support in more ways than one to all my patients even if it was only getting a patient dressed for their discharge from said hospital. While the need for everybody around me to be “well” never left even after traumatic experiences throughout life, I knew there was a way to apply it to the work I do, the person I am and the future of all my intentions. Nursing allows me to be my truly authentic self, even in the serious climate of life as we speak.
