There are two types of aid: need-based and merit-based. Federal need-based aid, for instance, is determine by a family's demonstrated ability to pay for college as calculated by the FAFSA.

Merit aid, on the other hand, can be awarded by an institution, college, or private organization to student for a specific talent or an athletic or academic ability. These awards aren't based on financial need.

College students are potentially eligible for federal, state and/or institutional aid.

Institutional aid is financial assistance provided by the college and varies by school, since each college uses its own policies and formulas to determine how to award its financial aid.

According to the department of education, most students qualify for some types of funds: loans, grants, and work-study programs,
