

This journal article relates to the course material by correlating ethical practice. The case of Jahi McMath raises uncertainties of decisions made within deciding if someone is alive or dead (Truog, 2018). Within the article, there are many different points of discussion discussing ethics and moral dilemmas. The concepts from class that this nursing student easily mastered this week are grasping nurses' greater understanding as advocates. As a nurse, it is vital to develop being an advocate as it is a concept to master to have a voice for clients. This week's difficult concepts for this nursing student are moral dilemmas, as the decision made is neither right nor wrong. Difficult decisions involve outcomes that may not always be the best, which is hard to grasp. Of everything this nursing student has done this week, this nursing student is most proud of correlating the material learned in class with real situations; being back in clinicals has helped tremendously. This week this student nurse has learned that gaining more knowledge and experience will help this nursing student grow as a person and a nurse.

Reference

Truog, R. D. (2018). Lessons from the case of Jahi McMath. Hastings Center Report, 48, S70–S73. <https://ezproxy.lakeviewcol.edu:2097/10.1002/hast.961>