

Joey Runde

Journal #2

This past week, I was again at the wound clinic, and I was also in the operating room. While I was in the wound clinic, I learned a lot of new information about wound healing. I thought it was pretty impressive how sheep intestines were vital to healing certain wounds. Along with that, I learned that collagen helped heal wounds significantly. Also, I was able to see the hyperbaric oxygen room and how these machines work on promoting wound healing. In the operating room, I was able to see two surgeries. One of them was a total left knee replacement. It was exciting how the doctor performed the surgery and placed the artificial knee in the place where his old knee was.

Once again, I was able to see some delegation in the clinical setting. At the wound clinic, the nurses had me clean more rooms to help lessen the work they had to do. I held the CPAP mask on the patient in the operating room while the nurse anesthetist drew up the medications.