

Claudia Mahaffy

March 16 2018

Screenwriting

Project Proposal

1967, Missouri was every hippies dream location. With forests surrounding the outskirts of the city, it was a perfect escape for those who wished to wander out of the business of life, to rejoin the earth the way it used to be. Out of one of these communes we see a family emerge. The Stewarts were the ideal family. Although the father (Sgt. Dale) had come from the city in search to shut down the hippies who were for the peace movement, he found love and peace in the last place he was looking for it. Dale and Terri made a life together in the winds that met the branches of their home where they shared everything with those who would travel through. They had three children during this time at the commune. Martha, Robin, and Glenn. All in that order.

As the days would pass the children would see the cars passing through the busy roads just outside of the commune. One day Glenn's best friend Dean was driving past the commune. They had met from prior engagements and had a lot in common although they came from two different worlds that happened to be situated right next to each other. Deans father worked for the Space corporation in the busy town of Missouri. He offered to one day take him there. His older brother had made arrangements to pick them up and drive them there. The journey more than ten yards outside the line of the commune, was Glenn's first, as well as his first time in a moving machine. But this exciting new experience brought nothing but hurt to Glenn. The accident on the way to the space module left him with severe, and untreated, soon thereafter PTSD. His parents had no insurance, no health care, and no way to treat him.

4 years after his accident the family relocated by bus to Arizona to a new commune that practiced healing rituals that came at no cost. But Dale, who was also sick, could not be healed. Too much damage had been done inside his body due to the severeness of his Legionnaires disease that had started even before any of the children were born. It had gone too long without being treated. He lay on a hospital bed only two weeks after arriving to the commune. His last wish before he took his last breather was that Glenn would find his way back to Missouri and go fly to the moon. The way back would be nothing short of a mentally and physically draining journey to find recovery and to find all that his dad had wanted him to find. Everything that was necessary to find himself could only be found through his journey that would surpass time and space.