According to my understanding of the Universal Declaration of Humans Rights the difference between the Universal Declaration of Humans Rights and the declaration in chapter 18 is that the Universal Declaration was written to everyone whereas men, women, everybody are equal regardless of race, religions, age, sex. While the declaration in chapter 18 was written to a specific group of individuals and some freedom, and right were limited there. Individuals have more rights, and more equality in the Universal Declaration. I believe "All human beings are born free, and equal in dignity and rights have been added. In the other one it said that men are born free instead of everyone. I do not get the second question, my guess would be as the Universal was written around world war I would assume that was the historical even that being added.
