

Week 1

The Hunger Games

Before I get started, I would like to quote Suzanne Collins. “No, I noticed just about every girl, but none of them made a lasting impression but you.” - Suzanne Collins. There are many girls in the world or in your soccer- team, whatever. But if you have some special skills, you become unique and you will leave a lasting expression. It is no different when it comes to writing. I find it very admirable when people can read the words off your lips and thus write exactly what the reader would like to read. The writer would receive great recognition from me.

As a writer I identify myself with the written story in “The hunger games”. There are several quotes from the novel “ The hunger games” that match my experiences, which is why I chose it as the title. Suzanne Collins has a very catchy style of writing. I like her good language and at the same time her topics because they encourage further work.

It often happens to me that I cannot sort my thoughts and then write them all over the place. I come up with a lot of good ideas that immediately make me so euphoric, so that I forget half of them while writing. Therefore, in my experience, it is very helpful to brainstorm first and to write down all ideas in key words.

In “The Hunger Games” the tributes have to kill the other to win. After every murder they are closer to the goal and always want more. It is a long way off, but when I was writing I found out that I wanted to add something after every idea. It spurs me to get the best out of myself and motivates me to make an effort.

While writing, I realized that it took me far too long to get started. As a result, I always lost a lot of time and had to bring it in again in the end, which often led to hasty thoughts and rash results.

I also have concerns as to whether the reader will understand my thoughts and conclusions. Because of that I am trying to formulate easy sentences

Having only talked about writing difficulties, it is time to add positive references.

What I particularly like about writing is that it helps me to reflect myself. It enables very deep thoughts and opens the door to getting to know different perspectives. It also helps to become more tolerant. I can relax and see my progress directly on paper. Finally, one must not forget that it brings intellectual progress and further education in the literary with.

Overall I am a very committed writer that accepts challenges. I am very ambitious, which does not make me give up easily. Similar to Katniss from “The hunger games” when she came to the arena from the worst district and won the fight through her strength.
