Within this essay will be reviewing, Old-Earth or Evolutionary Creation: Discussing with Reasons to Believe and Biologos, by Keathley Kenneth, J.B. Stump, and Joe Argirre. This novel is about two different sides of the spectrum that compare and contract their beliefs and such to each other. This book covers their differences of theology, issues on influence, and science relations. While reading this book it was very interesting to hear all of the different sides and views of the different topics. Some views make the reader think of things from the different perspective.

Even though most of the book is about the peoples' differences over the topics, some of the book on the other hand is about what they agree on as well. One of the things they agree on the most is the thought that God made man, he created us and they both think of the process of creation in the same way. They agree that God created the Earth billions of years ago, the part at which the separate in their beliefs is when it comes to creating evolution. They all believe there is a God who created everything, but the way everything came to the way it is today they all have their different views and opinions. As all good books should, the book explains how each person got to the reason or reasons as to why they believe what they believe, this is where the first biblical interpretation comes from, discussing this issue, the first of many that come later on in the book. This book is for a theologian, it shows how Christian believers in Christ can come together and have a disagreement but be respectful. Even though they believe most of the same thing, some things are different, but they respect each other's opinion and will listen to one another, even if they do not agree with the opinions the others are sharing. This teaches the reader how to be kind to other peoples' opinions on topics that both people do not agree on.

This book is an easy read for most teenagers or adult people, because it is so well organized and easy to understand with the topics clear, everything in the book is just laid out well, so it is easy to understand without confusion. The text and quotes were well laid out so they were easy to understand, as well as the conversations that went on were clear and easily comprehensible.

The big question, "Was the author convincing". Personally, I feel the author was convincing.

There were great points made in the book from both sides of the arguments and conversations.

They were very well worded, clear, and strong points on both sides. So, yes, the author was convincing. Not only were the conversations convincing but the scientific evidence that was there to back it up was convincing as well. This book not only opened my eyes to different views and such, but it made me have more confidence to test my limits and it made me want to challenge what I know with others. This book is such a good book, from the Christianity viewpoint, to scientific viewpoint, to the theological viewpoint and more. This book could be for many people, to make them open their eyes and test their knowledge with the ideas of new things from a different viewpoint.
