

Wanting Chen

College Writing I

Professor Marilyn McNeil

Lesson 10 Essay

November 30th, 2020

The Harm of Overindulgence in Children

Different parents have different ways to educate their children. Some parents are strict with their children, while others are indulgent. Different education methods have different effects on children. In my opinion, parents' overindulgence is not good, and it is harmful to the healthy development of children.

Parents spoil their children excessively, and their children will lack some skills. Every child is the treasure of parents. Children are raised in the palm of their parents' hands. Parents often worry about their children getting hurt, rather than let their children learn some skills. For example, my roommate's parents think riding a bicycle is very dangerous. It is easy to be hit by a car on the road, so she is not allowed to learn to ride a bicycle. When my roommate goes out, she can only take a bus or walk. Lack of some skills will make life a little inconvenient.

Parents spoil their children excessively, their children will connive at the development of children's mental illness. Some parents are very accommodating to their children. They buy whatever their children want and let their children do whatever their children want. For instance, my cousin was wronged at school and didn't want to go to school. My uncle and aunt let him stay at home instead of going to school. My cousin hasn't been out much since then. My uncle and aunt took him to the doctor, who said he had autism. As my cousin didn't want to see the doctor again, his illness was not well treated. The development of mental illness makes people less contact with the outside world.

The way parents educate their children contains their love for their children. A good way of education can promote the development of children, and a bad way of education will hinder the development of children. Overindulgence of children is not conducive to the development of children, so that children lack some skills, and is not conducive to the treatment of mental illness. Parents should be careful about their children's education.