Critical thinking

I am a determined young adult with a lot in store for his future. I'm not the best writer in the world but I write based on my emotions and how I feel. I try to journal everyday so that I could let off steam with things that frustrate me. I decided that dorming would be a better move for me than living in the apartment that I paid rent in. & that it was an expense that I wasn't ready to pay yet. For quite some time I've had to care for myself and find it hard that I live in a world where I am all by myself.

Naturally I am a critical thinker. I think a lot. In some cases it's not always positive because I weigh my options to a point where I am indecisive/unsure about what decision to make. I like anime cartoons, I like how they critically think of ways to identify their enemies weaknesses and use it against them. Even in a situation where it seems that they are completely beat and no way to win with the odds stacked against them. I aspire to be that witty and calm, cool & collected. I want to be a part of a show or movie that is just as thought provoking. Which is why I chose my major of communications. I know it has something to do with scripts and shows and the making of a great television show. The creators are communicating a message to the viewers. A theme that each person can take away. I came to the conclusion of choosing this major because all the shows that I've watched in my past have impacted my life in such a positive way. I want to do the same for future generations. It's a goal of mine that I would love to achieve. I do love my major because I am capable of doing many things. It is a very versatile field. I still have yet to find out and research what else is possible to do within this degree. I certainly believe that I'm on the correct path. I want to intern for the rest of my semesters to come. To further prepare myself for a great career in the future that can sustain my way of living.
