

Heejae Kang

1. Show you have a system

The goal here is to sound like you have a system or a process you follow. It doesn't have to be an exact science, but you want to sound like you approach decisions the same way, rather than doing something completely different each time or trusting your gut (don't reply by saying "I just trust my gut").

2. Give an example of a decision you made (and the outcome)

This is good advice for pretty much all of the interview systems you face don't just say how you'd do something, give examples.

3. Try to seem as logical and fact-based as possible!

Whatever you do, just remember that in almost all cases, it's best to seem logical when you describe how you make decisions. Show that you rely on facts, that you look to gather information before deciding, etc. Don't sound like you act on emotion or hunches. Employers don't want to hire someone who's going to be unpredictable, make decisions "on the fly", etc. So the best way to put their mind at ease when answering decision making questions is to show you follow a logical process.

Thank you.