

Thomas Nevill
Professor O'Hara
HIS144
1/30/23

Weapon Trading in the Late Agrarian Era

In the Late Agrarian Era weapon trade was quite a valuable commodity. Often they would fetch a high price when originating from a distant country because there was a low quantity of them. This also affected the transportation price/tax. This intense, long-distance trade route solidified itself as the peak accomplishment of global network activity. Of course there were sumptuary laws passed which would regulate/ prevent extravagance in the spending amount on not just weapons but simple things such as clothing, spices, and even furniture. Once weapons were being regularly traded as a commodity it increased warfare obviously.

Thomas Nevill
Professor O'Hara
HIS144
1/30/23

SOURCES:

I did not find anything online to help me with this assignment.