Question 7

Christianity and psychology are disintegrated because schools that either base their studies on faith or schools that don't at all kind of have divided and separated Christianity and psychology. A way to reintegrate Christianity and psychology is by using a method of balance of both faith and academic learning which will help connect both Christianity and Psychology. I think that they should be integrated because they will help connect people with God and also scientifically learn about psychology in a way without taking away a person's faith. This type of integration is pursued by introducing classes that can apply both psychology and Christianity and make connections that apply to both.

Question 8

Integration as a noun is what we find when finding the unity that was created in a Christian aspect. Integration as a verb is combining theories psychologically and spiritually and connecting both to understand the truth for both psychology and theology as well. At times we see integration as a form of understanding God's unification and not as a psychological connection to uncovering the truth.

Question 9

I think that using the term Christian Psychology gives off the wrong impression of what it is, from the perspective of non-believers they might see it as using God and the bible to understand humans socially and emotionally and using spirituality to justify. But in reality, it's just a combination of theology and psychology and not just of one aspect but a balance of both.
