

10. Forensic psychology is a branch that focuses on criminal cases, it could be like studying a criminal and giving a verdict of his mental state so that it can be determined if the person is in what mental state, and in the same way a sentence can be given depending on his mental state, for this branch it is necessary to have legal knowledge. It could also study a victim, and show how the fact that occurred affects his personal life, and his development and thus serve as a statement in a case.

18. I do believe that psychologists make a difference in people's lives, because I think it is very important to express how we feel and that in the same way, someone can analyze a little more our thoughts, behaviors, and thus be able to understand us a little more, as an example I could put a girl who feels bad because she is different from her friends at school, because she is quieter, does not like to go to parties, does not like to draw attention, does not like to draw attention, she does not like to be seen, she does not like to call attention, she likes to be alone, to do quiet activities, and for that reason her classmates treat her as boring and strange, a person who goes to a psychologist could understand that her personality is introverted, and so she will understand that there is nothing wrong with her, in that way she will accept herself and now she will only try to get closer to people with whom she can feel more comfortable, and so understand herself, and in that way love and appreciate herself.

17. If I were to pursue a career in psychology I would prefer to work outside of an academic environment because I would like to have my own practice, or I would also like to go to places where psychologists are not so familiar, such as marginalized areas of my country, orphanages, hospitals, churches, other types of communities that I know that many times do not have this. Since at least in my country, the only people who would have the right to a psychologist are people with money, I know there are mothers who do not know how to help drug-addicted children or even heal the pain of having a drug-addicted child, so offering this service in uncommon places would be more profitable for me.

12. Compare and contrast structuralism and functionalism.

As its name says, structuralism is known for having structures, elements or parts of the brain that lead us to act in a certain way, and functionalism is based on functionality, because it is based on the fact that each living being is designed with a different function. Structuralism focuses on scientific study, it is based on introspection is more about the mind, functionalism is also a scientific study focuses on introspection but this is to understand not the mind but the purpose of mental processes.

So in structuralism it would be important the wood, the walls, that is to say the elements, and in structuralism it would be important the functions of things like the rooms, or the door.
