

The word of God is for evermore the standard of will, and what Word has declared immutably that it is God's greatest desire and unalterable principle of action and will to render to every man according as he will believe, and especially to save all who will receive Christ by faith, and to heal all who will receive Christ by faith, and to heal all who will receive healing by similar faith, No one thinks of asking for forgiveness if the Lord will, Nor should we throw any stronger doubt on His promise of physical redemption.

After all, if God had wanted to guard us against the fanaticism of divine healing, Scripture would have made it evident that the Faith Cure was false, which, Simpson averred, was not the case - on the contrary.

Furthermore, there was no need to fear that one will not be able to exercise faith for a miraculous healing, since Christ actually lives the believer's spiritual and physical life for him, it is necessary to take his holiness for sanctification. The healing is not in our own body at first we consider it as good as dead, but in Christ's body, and as we look to it, its strength keeps coming in to ours, and we wax strong in faith.