This week's assignment of the frame it yourself is asking to construct a model of its hierarchy and cultural frame. Several questions asked: How does it resemble other hierarchies? And What cultural or organizational features distinguish it?

In Ancient Egypt The Hittites (which is known as modern day Turkey) government consisted of The King ruling over the whole country. That was considered the old world. In the new world the King doesn't" rule the entire kingdom there other people that would rule certain areas of the kingdom.

In the old kingdom of the Hittite around the 13th and 14th century one King (The Great King) he normally is in charge of all areas of the kingdom but he chooses to place other in charge of areas he maybe week in or need someone to be his eyes and take lead in that area so he can focus on other things. The King can place leaders in his soldier/guards, scribes/pastor, head foreman on building new projects, chef in charge of the kitchen help and the King's diet.

Another form of leadership of the Hittite kingdom or empire that the King separates his duties from is appointing governors in each city to oversee that location. It's basically like the United States. We have a President Joe Biden who leads the country but each state has its own governor that is overseeing each state and each city/town has a mayor overseeing that area. I don't think there is much difference from the past and present in hierarchy structure from the past and present. The difference is that technology changed which can increase more rolls or decrease rolls.
