Week 3

Another day of working 12 hours - I haven't felt fresh air in 12 hours. Well, fresh air is relative because how fresh can the air in New York City really be ?; is what Jonathan thought. It's been 2 months since he moved to the city for his dream job - or that's what he thought back then. Looking at the picture of his wife and kids, whom he has been missing a lot lately makes him question his decision and question his future as well. The plan was for him to get the job and get comfortable in their new apartment until his children's school year was over and they would join him. Marriage hasn't been all love and roses lately, he's aware of that, but 2 months ago he didn't dare to question her commitment. The solemn solitude of life in the city changes your perspective and might invite unwanted thoughts that have been buried deep under the busy and eventful daily life in the suburbs. The problem is that this job has been his goal coming out of college but he thought it impossible at this point in his career and obligations so it was never taken seriously by his wife. Once the opportunity revealed itself he signed without a second thought and disrupted the flow and routine at home which might prove fatal to the relationship - kept together by the routine and their children. The not-so-dreamy reality has shaken his confidence and the uncertainty of the future weighs on his shoulder and he's asking himself; Will they be joining me this summer?
