McClelland Test

The given picture shows a specific situation. In this situation, I can see a man in his working clothes, around his 40s or 50s, looking at a picture of what can be perceived as his family. He seems to be sitting down in a chair in his office or possibly at home after coming back from work. The man is with his shoulders shrugged and appears to be sad or concerned for his family. Another thing we can assume for what I described previously is that he didn't have a good day at work or his goals are not going the way he planned, therefore, he is worried about providing for his family. This is if he has a high need for achievement. If he has a high need for affiliation, he can be thinking about himself and his family's well being or even their personal relationships. Another possibility is that he is troubled by the thought of not being able to protect or take care of his loved ones, this would be because he has a high need for power.

If the image had colors, it would be much more helpful because colors help to discern the environment or the type of emotions of the situation.
