My views of the cosmos and the natural world draw from my religious beliefs. The universe consists of humans and non-human matters created by God. Humans are responsible for caring for the natural world and using it to meet their unique purposes. The components within the cosmos are perfectly designed to create ideal conditions that enable the survival of the natural world.

My answer to the question emanates from my political views. Proper social order in the modern world depends on the strengths and legitimacy of the government. The social contract theory looks at how the rulers and the ruled agree on what constitutes an order. The subjects agree to live according to the rules specified by the government. In turn, the authorities guarantee their citizens specific rights and privileges.

Morality is relative in every society. What is wrong in one culture might be right in another. However, in the modern world, scholars have proposed several universal ethical principles, which include justice, autonomy, fidelity, beneficence, and nonmaleficence (Varkey 17). However, in some instances, individuals rely on their religion as the primary guide to distinguishing between bad and good behavior.
