In identifying the eight key elements of policy frameworks, I took noticed how each element is a good approach on deciding and proving how a social policy or program would be beneficial to an individual. I feel that the step-by-step guide as to how an analyst views each social policy or program is a good way that is helpful in analyzing the positive and negative side to each policy or program. It is also helpful in determining the facts, as it looks at the content and how it will serve its purpose – also how a social policy may benefit even if it is for only one individual. The key element also assists the analyst take a look at other past or future policies and looking at the perspectives on how it will serve or will serve to the individuals, because that it what is important for the people to benefit from the social policy or program that will help them for either short or long-term.

I feel that where we see incompatibilities with the political process through which policies are actually adopted is reflected on immigration laws or policies. I feel that this issue has been going on for a long time where immigrational laws and policies haven't been beneficial to undocumented or legal immigrants as they have been in this country and in my opinion have been treated unfairly because there aren't any laws or policies that protects them in way that is beneficial to them. They're here trying to make a living or seek education and are faced with fear and anxiety because laws and policies don't guarantee them their status here in America.

It is stated in the text “the purpose of a policy framework is to provide the analyst with a model or a set of questions for systematically analyzing a policy.” (Karger and Stoesz, Pg. 50) I feel that this makes a lot of sense when looking at how immigrational policy or laws here in America and how so much change needs to be done for them to be treated fairly as they have made contributions in this country and the United States has benefited from it.
