

WEEK 5 RESEARCH AND WRITING

If Alexander the Great had died in his first battle and never conquered Persia, the world would have been forever changed. The Age of Empires would have taken a vastly different course.

Without Alexander's leadership and military prowess, the vast Persian Empire would have continued to hold sway over the ancient world, with its influence stretching from Greece to India. The spread of Greek culture and ideas, which became known as Hellenism, would never have taken place.

The Macedonian Empire, which Alexander built, would have crumbled without its leader. Greece, as well as the rest of the world, would have missed out on the new advancements in philosophy, art, and science that emerged from the Hellenistic period.

In its place, a different world would have taken shape, one in which the Persians maintained their power and the ancient world was dominated by the East, not the West. The legacy of Alexander the Great would have been nothing more than a footnote in history, and the world would be vastly different from the one we know today.

In short, if Alexander had died in his first battle, the Age of Empires would have been forever altered, with Persia maintaining its power, the spread of Greek culture and ideas never taking place, and a vastly different world emerging in its place.