He seems to be writing to the people from the prospective of how things should be governed in society. How the government should be run and how we should treat one another. It seems as if he is saying everyone has a role to play. It sounds like he is arguing against government as if they don't know what they are doing and at other times he seems to say are rule all the while making his own suggestions on how things should go in a very opinionated way. When Master Chu speaks about world order not being established by itself and it should be fair, just and impartial I agree with that. This is how we should live as a democracy. This in my opinion of his writing is what he was trying to convey. When government rules with an iron fist as he seemed to be saying, then people don't give their all, everyone has something to give. The frame I believe this is shaped in is yellow and blue. I believe the frame is yellow in some area because he is talking about the bureaucracy of the government and blue because we have to network with officials those at the top and the common people those considered to be at the bottom. I think Master Chu feels government has a one track mind and only wants what feel will suit the needs of those in high places.
