

1. The nature of the cosmos: People's understanding of the cosmos is shaped by their beliefs, culture, and scientific knowledge. Some might see the cosmos as a vast and complex system governed by natural laws, while others might view it as a divine creation with a purpose or meaning. In my opinion according to my faith God created the universe (the heavens and the earth) He is Divine and exists beyond time and space, which makes Him all-knowing, all-powerful, and His creation all of it has a purpose including me and knowing this goes beyond logic and faith.
2. Social order: Different people have different ideas about what constitutes a just and orderly society. Some might base their views on religious teachings or philosophical principles, while others might look to political and economic systems for guidance. While my social order is determined by my religion, in the United States majority of the rules and regulations are determined by political and economic systems established by individuals whom are no longer, order is kept by punishment of the law and the predetermined punishment set for specific crimes. This is not exactly in accordance with my religious beliefs, I do believe that my God knows best for all.
3. Individual ethics: Ethics can be determined by religious beliefs and teachings, cultural traditions, personal experiences, and philosophical perspectives. Some might prioritize individual autonomy and personal freedom, while others might emphasize the importance of community and social responsibility. However my individual ethics is determined by my faith, with in in Christ Jesus and my moral compass is to press towards the teachings and the ways of Christ the son of God according to my beliefs.

In general, people's answers to these questions are likely to be influenced by a combination of factors, including their religious beliefs, political ideologies, cultural traditions, and personal experiences. The founding documents of a nation can also play a role in shaping people's perspectives, especially in terms of individual rights and responsibilities. It is important to continue engaging with these questions and striving to find answers that can guide our societies and shape our values.
