Abigail Sorantino

2/20/23

      If Alexander didn't survive in the Persian war, there would be so many things that probably wouldn't turn out the way that they did. My theory is that Persia or another country would have taken over Rome and established a completely different culture system that the Romans would have had to conform to. Also, the Roman Empire most likely wouldn't expand or exist the way that it did actually happen, and their people could have become slaves to another country. They wouldn't have gone through Cecilia, and they also wouldn't have won other battles that were supposed to take place when Greece invaded Persia. I think that the Rome wouldn't be its own Empire because they wouldn't have had Greece as an example as an Empire to build themselves up on. Alexander the Great came around 300 years before the Roman Empire. Greece helped contribute the expansion of Rome and it ultimately became one of the biggest expansions in our history. If Alexander the Great didn't survive, the Greeks would have most likely lost the war against Persia and the civilization of Rome wouldn't exist. Persia would have taken over the western civilization and there would have been more Islamic culture or religion that would have dominated all of the Western Mediterranean culture. Zoroastrianism which is one of the oldest historical religions from Persia that could have been what influenced, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. If Persia was controlling the Empire the sciences, knowledge, art, and culture that we have now it would probably be erased. All of what we learned and what the Western civilization has contributed to us would be lost and it would change history. If Israel was occupied by the Persian Empire and not the Roman Empire during the time of Christ, perhaps Christianity would not exist, and its positive influences brought throughout the world would not be noticed. Or perhaps it does but it comes out in a completely different way, either way maybe Gods plan would change, because Rome would be conquered and ruled over and then since Israel has a similar culture to Persia, they would have just become part of their civilization anyway if they weren't already united. Ultimately, I think the whole outcome of how Jesus would have been received by people and how his life originally was would have been a little different because the history and the changes made to civilization would alter how things would play out.