

Jordan Mack

Professor O'Hara

HIS114

16 February 2023

The English and French governments and culture at the time had similarities and differences. The English culture and government was very separated from society and state. The monarchy was at the head of the state, still currently is, and society works its way from aristocracy to working class. In France they had a separation of classes through estates. There were stresses in France between the old and new cities with tax exemptions and political influence between different groups was not where it should have been. The French did have a stronger government and monarchy than the English.

If he had successfully invaded there would be a great change. The parliamentary style government would have had a struggle to stay ahead of the current government. John Locke's works probably wouldn't have been so important to our history. They wouldn't have that much significance compared to how they are today, and how they are taught in education to be so historically revolutionary. There would be a fight between the current settlers at the time in North America and the French.

This Revolution set up North America for its next important piece of history, the Industrial Revolution.

