

1) We have learned that wind power, water power and, most of all, muscle power were the means by which jobs were done. How do you see these elements conveyed in this film?

The primary element that struck me in the movie was the use of physical strength. I was astounded by the way individuals provided for themselves, managing to acquire sustenance with remarkable efficiency. The men demonstrated their physical progress while tilling the earth, cutting and manipulating wood, and extracting minerals with the aid of a donkey. However, their utilization of physical strength extended beyond acquiring food, as it was also essential for constructing their dwellings.

2) The film is about "worst jobs" - which of these do you consider the "worst of the worst" and why?

The most dreadful task involved the completion of the wall using sticks, but they required the wattle and daub mixture, consisting of water, mud, straw, and excrement. The men would scour the area and collect feces, which they would fill in buckets and use to reinforce the wall. It was a messy job, and they didn't wear any protective gear. The mixture served to bind the soil to the walls and maintain its cohesion. Personally, I concur that the labor was justifiable, given the circumstances they faced in order to survive.
