

Jeanine Gherardi

February 18, 2023

World Civilization

Alternate History

Alexander Willianson was defeated by the Persian Empire under the command of King Darius 111 at the Granicus River, in a battle that would go down in history. King Darius joined his troops on the battlefield and defeated King Alexander despite the fact that Alexander was an accomplished military leader. King Alexander had inherited King Philip's plot to conquer Persia. Alexander was no match for the great skills of the Persian Empire, who were known for their modernity of military. King Darius 111 earned the name King Darius the Greatest Victor, after winning the battle that would bring Persian culture to Greece, and Persian remained the original empire standard.

King Darius the Greatest Victor was recognized for his abilities, the strength of his satraps and military commanders were exceptional after his victory over a much smaller Macedonian army. He was tolerant of religion and national differences, and like Persia, Darius outlawed slavery in Greece. Some of the Greek philosophers noticed the developments the King made and they developed schools of wisdom and Persia started to adopt some of the Greek philosophy developments into their culture frameworks. The invention of democracy and freedom stopped the "infighting" between Greek states. A strong Persian empire, continued to dominate the region, and expand its Persian influence beyond its borders.

Since the Persian Empire had a government-run road and canal system it was able to adopt some of the Greek cultures such as sculpture, theater, and the Olympic Games.”

Britannica, The Editors of Encyclopaedia. "Alexander the Great summary". Encyclopedia Britannica, 29 Apr. 2021, <https://www.britannica.com/summary/Alexander-the-Great>. Accessed 12 February 2023.

Frameworks of World History: Networks, Hierarchies, Culture, Volume One: To 1550.
<https://platform.virdocs.com/r/s/0/doc/562319/sp/174109613/mi/561056384?cfi=%2F4%2F4%2F2C%2F1%3A0%2C%2F1%3A0>.