

Tynique Burton

Professor Lyndell O'hara

World Civilization I

2-20-23

What if Alexander the Great had died in his first battle ?

What if Alexander the Great died in his first battle? What would that change in our known history? Alexander the Great was known for being one of the biggest military minds in all of our history because not only did he have a great mind but a great military but what if he had fallen in his first battle? What would that overall look like? So Alexander's first battle was his invasion of the Persian empire because he wanted to take the empire down like his father was planning to do before being assassinated. He planned for a while on where to strike and who because the Persian empire was a huge empire so Alexander had to attack the empire by sections.

But what if Alexander never won that battle what if he was killed mid battle, well first the persian empire would see this as an opportunity to take over Macedonia and the rest of the land which was their plan in the beginning but failed but now that Alexander took over all of the Hellenistic Kingdoms would be easier to attack than before ultimately making the persian empire a stronger foe. Which means Alexander's influence wouldn't hit Rome so Caesar's Rome would look different which means that the US and other western powers would look different today which is crazy to think about because of how Alexander's influence millions.