

Orlando Martinez

Professor OHara

World Civ1

21 February 2023

If Alexander the great had died on his first battle to try and conquest Persia it would completely change all of history, he would not be called Alexander the Great and history wouldn't really speak of him much. The whole Persian Empire would be different they wouldn't have to worry about being conquered changing everything. Alexander's military wouldn't have to fight so many battles and his trusted generals and soldiers would have never tried to plot against him since they haven't seen their families for years. The Hellenistic kingdoms would have never been conquered by Alexander which Hellenic means to imitate greek since Alexander had conquered them but that would never be the case since he died on the first battle. The Great Empire of Persia I think would overwhelm the greeks and they instead would have conquered them and possibly the whole world.

The successor in India and Rome would be Persia and their king since they would have the strongest empire and they have many numbers in soldiers. Alexander dying would great benefit Persia its crazy that just that person dying completely changes history.