

Chapter 9

41. The parent is basically unresponsive to the child needs and really sets no structure in the home for the child. The parent could be suffering from depression or some sort of drug abuse that is taken away from their ability to parent.

47. According to the textbook in an experiment with a three-week old baby and we're guards to hearing his/her mother's voice started sucking on their pacifier more intensely from that particular sound.

48. Newborns also have a strong sense of smell that they can differentiate between their mother and a stranger. According to the textbook with the experiment the gauze pads that smelt like the infant's mother they would turn their head towards the familiar smell.

54. It's really interesting to answer this question after former president Jimmy Carter just return home to his family in Atlanta to live out the rest of his days in Hospice care. Aspect care as a way of a person living out there final days in life with pain management love in a comfortable recognizable environment outside of a hospital setting with their family.

65. Because I personally grew up in an authoritarian household, I want it to be more authoritative with my own personal children. I guess, because of the culture I felt my parents were strict, as I was a first generation American with parents of a

Caribbean background. I wanted my children to be open and feel like they're able to talk to me in an honest manner, and they understood that I was their parent and not their friend, but willing to listen and give honest advice with discipline when needed.
