A Family Heirloom

In my family, we have this very sacred piece of clothing that has been handed down from generation to generation. It's the same piece of clothing my great-grandmother brought with her when she came to America for the first time. It is believed that it gives good luck and fortune to whoever owns it. We don't even wash it because we don't want it to lose any of its properties. This heirloom caused a huge argument between my mother and her siblings because my mom believes that the heirloom is supposed to go to her since she is the firstborn, but her siblings think differently. They believe that the heirloom should be shared with everyone, and no one should have ownership of it. My father suggested that they cut up this beautiful piece of clothing with all the siblings. That way, everyone has a piece of the fortune, a piece of the family heirloom. Everyone thought that was terrible but, in the end, I suggested that each sibling would share the heirloom by keeping it in their respective homes for a year. They all agreed! It has been a few years since I've set eyes on the crimson luck bringer. Hopefully, this fall I get to see it again but until then, all I have is this picture my aunt sent me recently, and yet, I still feel its good fortune and warmth exuding through the pixels.
