At first, nationalism in Germany in the 18th century was not developed to the general population. It was more geared to the elites that were intellectually inclined and in certain states of Germany. German Nationalist Friedrich Karl von Moser wrote and I quote his statement, “comparing to the British, Swiss, Dutch and Swedes, the Germans did not have a view point.”

That being said, by the 19th century Germans encouraged unity, patriotism and national identity of oneness, “one national and one person” merging the people by the same language, culture, remembrance and or common history.” Furthermore, when nationalism began it took up the interests of romantic nationalism during the war of the Napoleonic by Philosopher Johann Goffreid Herder.
