Conservatism is the people's attempt to move toward the past in order to preserve hereditary monarchs.

Classical liberalism stems from the enlightenment which allowed more people to have more say in pushing change in society.

Nationalism is the social construct that is formed from a common language, culture, history, and various other facts which can make or break in societies.

Utopian socialism believes that if small communities work hard together to benefit each other, they can succeed as a society.

Romanticism is the belief that life is much more than cold hard facts and rationality and should be instead driven by feeling and through the power of nature.
