

The role of Constantine and Christianity; suppose Constantine did not make Christianity legal, what would have happened to Christians? I am a Christian, and my family background is Christianity. Imagine if Constantine had a dream to destroy Christianity instead of making Christianity a religion.

What if Maxentius had defeated Constantine and Christianity had remained outlawed by the Roman Empire? Today anyone practicing Christianity could be killed by the Romans, like the previous killing of those who practiced Christianity religion. Then we must question whether Constantine had not used the cross on his sword and his army did not follow his lead and placed the cross on their swords. What would have happened to Constantine and his army without his vision of the cross? Maxentius's paganism would have continued to dominate, and the rise of Christianity would never have happened.

The church would not be in our past and our present. The Bible would not be available. The ten commandments would not be available for us to follow. The message of how Jesus Christ died for us would have never told us to know the sacrifice Christ suffered for our sins. There would be no Christmas, no Easter to represent Christ as a raisin. Salvation and forgiveness would not be a thing. The impact of not knowing Jesus and the many prophets in the Bible, such as Moses and Paul, would be a vast miss in biblical and religious education to help guide us in times of trouble and in times of need.

The degrees of change the world would look like had Constantine not promoted Christianity is very alarming. The fact is that the prince of peace, Jesus, would not have been able to tell us about the need for consensus among family, friends, nations, and tribes.
