Networked Items

There are a couple items that I am used to in my everyday life that are part of a flow of networks, leading me to eventually be able to use them in my day to day life. The first item that I can think of would have to be my hair brush. The brand I currently use is Torino Pro, which has a manufacturer based in Connecticut. The network flow begins there, as the brushes are manufactured in the shop and then shipped off to Amazon. From there, Amazon brings the product from the facility to where I reside. Another item that comes to mind is the mayonnaise that my family uses. Hellman's mayonnaise, though a global market, has a primary facility in Ontario which is where trucks deliver the content to and from supermarkets across the globe. I currently use an iPhone. Despite it currently being in America, varying components of my phone come from across the globe. My battery is from China, my camera and screen is from Japan, etc. The forks we use at my house belong to Winco stainless. Winco itself is a manufacturing company based in Idaho. This company has 138 locations which from there they spread their product throughout the market. The air conditioning unit we use, called LG, is its own manufacturer and is based in South Korea. This product is shipped via airplane and helps people throughout the globe have access to air conditioning. Finally, my laptop which is an HP, which is an acronym for Hewlett-Packard company, is its own manufacturer in America. This company often partners with Home Depot, which also does delivery as well. If I didn't have all of these products all of a sudden, the adjustment period would be very hard for me, however I think I would eventually be okay.
