Communism and Facism were both ideologies that came in the early 20th century after the Arargian period. Strong leaders like Benito Mussolini and Karl Marx's revolutionary writings that helped these ideologies become successful in the states of China, Russia, and Italy.

Communism is a ideology that wanted to bring a utopian world to China and Russia. Karl Marx believe in his writings that human relationships with the environment creates class distinctions and that class history created class conflict. Communism wanted to eliminate capilalist ideas and wanted to become industrialized since communism was brought up in states that were not idustrialized. It offered a path to modernization for the country. It stood against nationalism, imperialism, and discrimination, it wanted to remove anything like the Jim Crow laws that were in America. It was avowdely democratic unlike Facism.

Facism was the continuation and ideological intensification of the 19th century conservatism. It exploited fear of transformation to keep and continue to gain power. Facism was brought up in states that previously were industrialized. It was against social transformation and completely anti-communist. It included ideas like "racial purity" and could be xenophobic, anti-immigrant, anti-jewish, and anti-racial enemy. The main want behind Facism was to create state and military power that were created by industrilization without social transformation.
