

1. The theology of ancient worship is difficult to grasp because it is vastly different from modern worship practices. Ancient worship was focused on the presence of God, while modern worship is often more focused on the experience of the worshiper. Additionally, modern Christians are separated from ancient Christians by thousands of years of cultural and historical change, which makes it difficult to fully understand the mindset of the early Church.
2. The creeds given to the Church before AD 600 were the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, and the Chalcedonian Creed. These creeds affirm the essential doctrines of the Christian faith, including the Trinity, the divinity and humanity of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead.
3. The architecture of a house of worship can dictate the type of music appropriate for that setting in several ways. For example, if the space is "dry," meaning it has little or no reverberation, then music that relies on harmonies and individual voices may be more appropriate. If the space is "wet," meaning it has a lot of natural reverberation, then music that emphasizes a more blended sound may be more appropriate. Additionally, the use of microphones can depend on the acoustics of the space, as well as the desired sound and style of the music being performed.
4. In the Old Testament, the design of the tabernacle and the temple was highly symbolic, with each element having a specific meaning and purpose. The music was also an integral part of worship, with the psalms and other songs being used to praise God and remember his deeds.
5. If given the opportunity to implement ancient-future worship in chapel services, one approach might be to incorporate elements of the early Church's liturgy, such as the use of responsive readings, prayers, and creeds. Musical selections could include traditional hymns and chants, as well as more modern songs that draw on ancient themes and motifs. The goal would be to create a worship experience that emphasizes the presence of God and the continuity of the Christian faith throughout history.
